(How) do rule of law and good governance conduce to development? A predictive prioritisation of targets and indicators

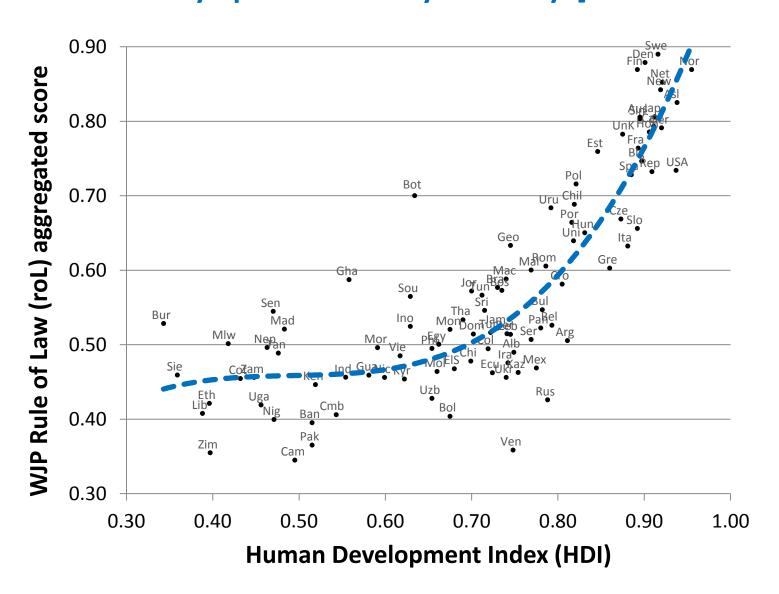

Mark Orkin PhD

Aggregate RoL and HDI, at country level, are undoubtedly well correlated (in one or other direction, or both!)

[An aside: this correlation gets much closer and steeper halfway up the HDI – any idea why?]

Disaggregating RoL into its WJP components / "targets", based on measurable indicators, and relating them to development: how?

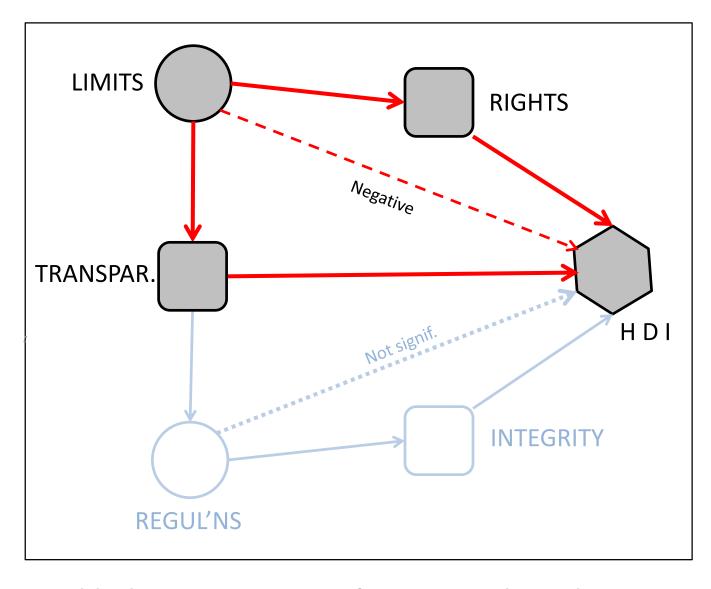

Simplify the preceding diagram as: lower part in blue, upper part in black, adjuncts in green

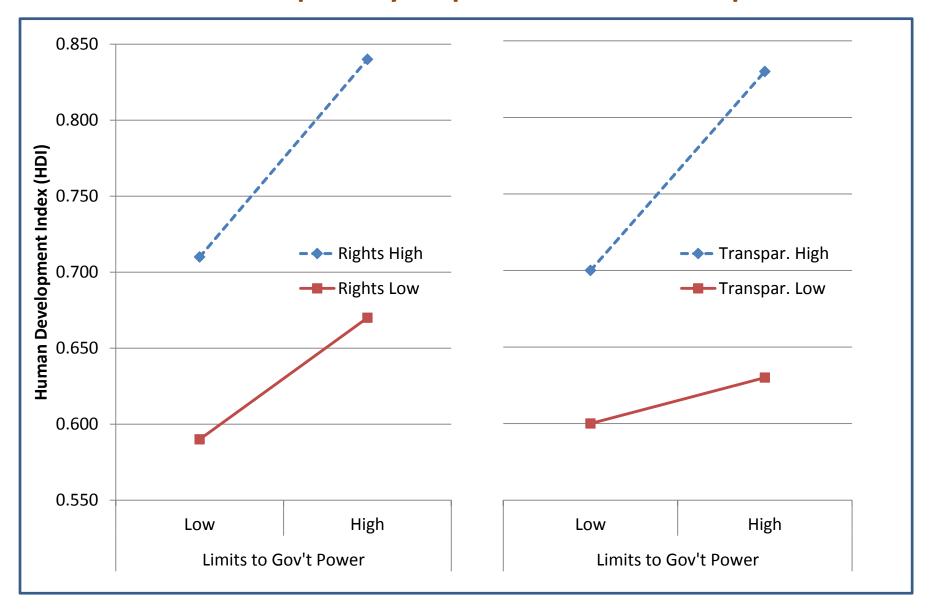

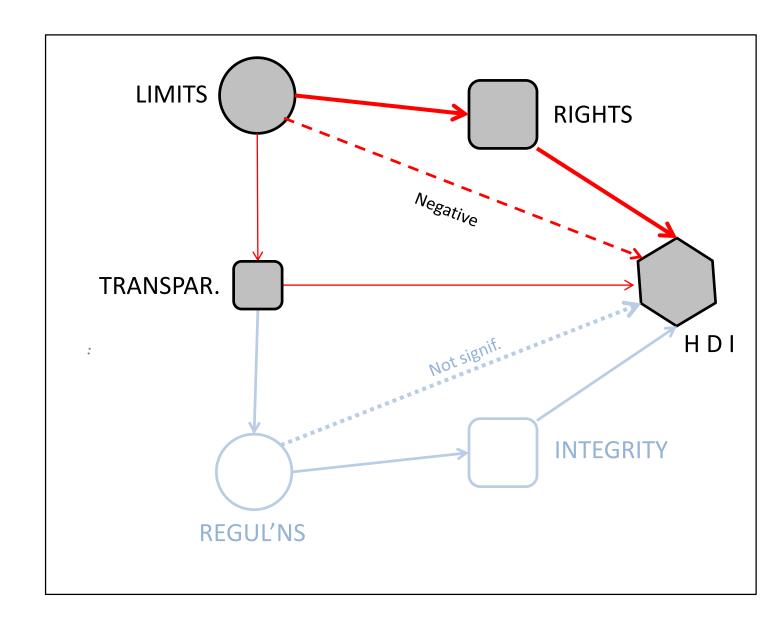

In the lower part in blue: Transparency fosters Development both directly, and indirectly via improved Regulations and Integrity. (The paths are nearly equally strong: .45 and .38)

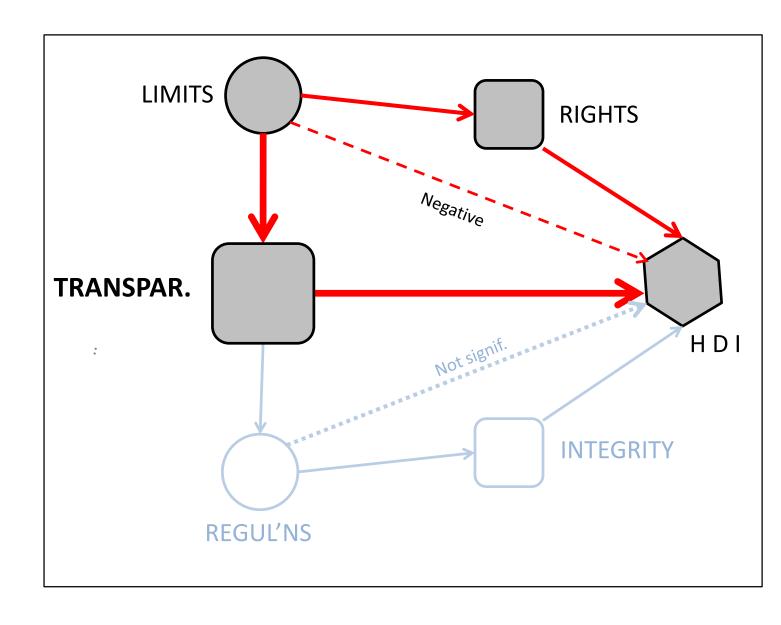

In the upper part, in black: Limits to Power fosters HDI through two indirect paths: via Human Rights, and via Transparency. Together, these two paths outweigh the negative direct effect (.82 vs -.58)

For the statistically minded: an "interaction" between Limits and Transparency amplifies the latter 's impact on HDI

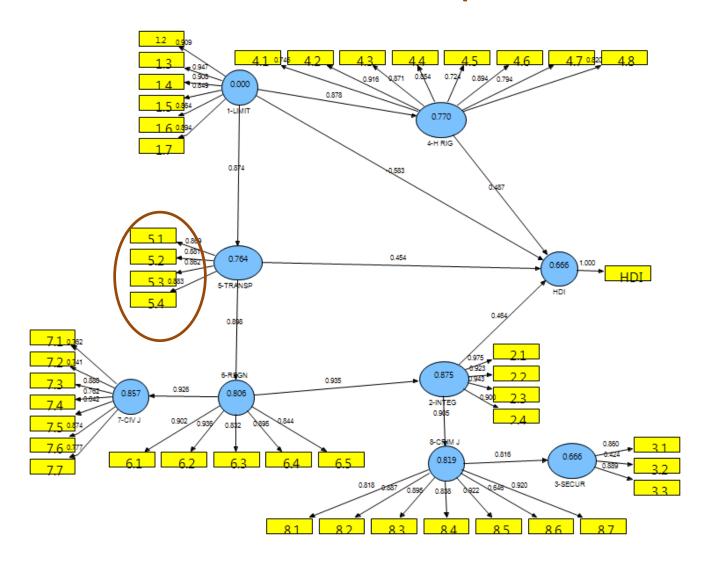

This amplified impact on Development, as Transparency increases...

... can be depicted graphically as above.

The statistical technique also indicates the relative strength of each measurable indicator to its component of RoL

Take-out for discussion – an evidence-base for the enabling role of RoL (core, cognates and adjuncts)

- To do these stats at all, we've assumed that RoL furthers development (HDI) – but the other way round also needs research
- Using sound WJP data, we have found not just a gross correlation, but that the components of RoL in relation correlate strongly with development
- The primary mosaic is:
  - Open Gov't/Transparency fosters development via Regulatory Enforcement and Integrity/Absence of Corruption (no direct link)
  - Limited Government Powers foster development via Open Gov't
     /Transparency and via Fundamental Rights (otherwise a neg. link!)
- There are also secondary or adjunct implications:
  - Regulation -> Civil justice;
  - Absence of corruption -> Criminal justice -> Order and Security
- The measurable indicators for each component are relevant and can be empirically prioritised – but they are all quite strong anyway
- In sum, have an indication (based on both popular and expert assessments) for prioritising components of RoL, with sensible indicators, that correlate with, perhaps even foster, development
